OUR STORY

Pottery in Moknine is not a recent craft; it is part of a long and deeply rooted history dating back to Antiquity. Archaeological excavations have uncovered kilns from the Punic and Roman periods, confirming that the use of local clay goes back thousands of years.

In its early stages, this activity was mainly limited to the production of simple everyday objects such as the boukal, the halbia, and other small items, before gradually developing. Under the Hafsid dynasty, Moknine established itself as a recognized center of craftsmanship. For a long time, the town specialized in “small pottery,” while Djerba particularly Guellala preserved the know-how of making large pieces such as jars and khabias, using a specific coil-building technique. Around 40 to 45 years ago, a major turning point occurred. According to local accounts, a craftsman from Djerba came to work in Moknine. From that moment on, Moknine potters, driven by determination, observed, experimented, and eventually mastered this technique on their own.

This led to a profound transformation of their activity, marked by the shift from producing small items to large-scale pieces, opening a new phase of development. Additionally, some workshops adopted the name “Guellala,” in reference to the region in Djerba.

Over the past thirty years, with the growth of exports, Moknine has gradually become the main pottery export hub in Tunisia. Artisans have adapted to the requirements of international markets, complying with European and American standards while modernizing their production methods.

Today, pottery in Moknine is no longer just an ancestral heritage; it is a living and dynamic craft capable of constant reinvention. It combines tradition and innovation to meet the tastes of an increasingly diverse clientele, and its products are now marketed both locally and internationally.

"In every piece of clay lies the potential for beauty, waiting for patient hands to reveal it."
